This is indeed a rare bit of fantasy. An adventurer bivouacked for the night on the torrid sands of the Sahara Desert is awakened by a staccato sound coming from the earth beneath his head. Digging, he unearthed a box containing telegraph instruments from which a cable extended straight down through the earth. In this box he found a slip of paper initialed D.I. Knowing that eleven years ago in this arid spot two prospectors had tunnelled their way to the core of the earth, he recalled that one was David Innes who Mr. Burroughs had chronicled on that earth-ward trip. He immediately informed Mr. Burroughs of his find. Mr. Burroughs hastened to the spot and soon was in telegraphic communication with David Innes. From the core of the earth comes a strange and marvelous account of his exploration of the Great Empire of Pellucidar, its people, gigantic animals, grotesque beauty, its perpetual sun and his love and hazardous search for Dian the Beautiful. Mr. Burroughs has given us this story just as he received it by telegraph from David Innes in Pellucidar, five hundred miles beneath this earth's surface.
